In front of the Lahore Museum is a big gun called Zam-Zammah. Sitting on top of the gun was a young boy. He wore trousers, a shirt and a hat. His name was Kim. People had given him another name too: they called him Little Friend of all the World. It was against orders to sit on the gun, but Kim did not pay attention to orders.

Kim's parents were British. His father, Kimball O'Hara, had been in the British army in India. First, Kim's mother had died. Then his father had started smoking opium and drinking, until he too had died. Now, Kim was thirteen years old, and he lived with a poor Indian woman. His skin had become brown in the sun. He spoke Urdu better than English, and he preferred wearing Hindu or Muslim clothes. If there was a marriage or a festival in the city, Kim put on his Indian clothes and sang and shouted with all the other small boys.
